Psychoanalysis describes two different types of personality structure: schizophrenic and neurotic. The disease-typical aspects of the schizophrenic type are described, typical of the associated neurotic phenomena. In the treatment of neurotic, psychoanalytic methods often are to be preferred in many cases, even when specific neurotic disorder-like symptoms are absent. While the schizophrenic is often not easily able to enter into psychoanalytic treatment on any account, the neurotic can often profit from specific analytic methods for the treatment of neurotic personality structures. It is pointed out that the psychoanalytical treatment of neurotic structures which have schizophrenia-like characteristics goes along with a possible remission of the psychotic symptomatology. This is discussed on the basis of the description of the evidence resulting from comparative psychoanalytic treatment and of the results of psychoanalytic treatment of schizophrenic and of neurotic patients.Tag Archive: Lisa W.
