The present invention relates generally to rotary printing machines and in particular to an improved method and apparatus for directing sheets to be printed within a printing machine. Rotary printing machines, such as flexographic printing machines, use raised image areas known as relief plates to print a desired image on a printing plate or on a sheet of paper or other suitable medium. The relief plates are mounted on a printing plate cylinder or on a rotating drum. The raised image areas are created in the relief plate by controlling the pressure of an ink-attenuated fountain solution applied to the plate surface by one or more fountain rollers. After the fountain rollers apply the ink-attenuated fountain solution to the plate surface, a sheet of paper or other medium is pressed against the fountain-wetted surface. The ink is then transferred to the
