I read up on these code style checkers, and am not quite sure on how it works. It seems like any criterion you want to be true can be set here. For example, if I wanted some of the functions to only take classes and classes to only take objects, I would simply set that to true, and each function/method would then fail a test to make sure it passes with certain conditions (ie, an object must only be created with an object, and not a class). Is my understanding of the criterion correct? How do they work? Here is a link to a reference page. A: I just didn't understand how rubocop worked, but now that I do, I can figure out the right way to use it. If someone knows a more clear way to do this, please let me know. Basically, if you want to use Rubocop, you need to create a new file, and make that file a subclass of plain ruby. Then, you can add in a method called .call(@config) And this will be used as a helper. For example, instead of using puts 'ruby says hello' One could do puts 'yay, i say hello' to make sure that it uses ruby's own string handling. I use this a lot in a helper called .check_opts(...) and .call(config:options) With this approach, Rubocop is your own helper, that other programmers can use to check their code, and have it all work out of the box, without having to try to understand what it's doing.
