the outbreak does not actually occur until the midpoint of the movie, but train to busan still maintains the highest body count of any of the zombie movies out there. the entire plotline takes place during an idealized fantasy world, devoid of human life outside of a handful of actors and singers. and people are just trying to survive the zombie apocalypse. the reviews were mixed, but the box office still paid off for its director. the film was nominated for best international feature at the asian academy of film & television awards. some people thought the movie was boring. critics commented on the over-the-top apocalyptic setting. one review commended the horror and gore factor of the zombies. despite the mixed reviews, the online responses to train to busan were overwhelmingly positive. a lot of people saw it for the first time and loved it. nearly 80 people related the movie to a tv show, such as the walking dead. even more likely were the references to dying hard, another zombie franchise. many people compared the zombies to puppets, with extensive filming. but some said they could see more human emotions. one person even pointed out that the zombie eggs, carried away in a train, represent the sins and evil of humanity. the storyline begins with a pandemic-causing virus that has swept through the human population. the zombies, as the infected call themselves, have consumed everything, thus becoming a threat to the remaining humanity. to combat this threat, seoul proposes to use the stay calm app to control the horde of zombies. the app is a hit with the general population, but the military is opposed to it.
