InDesign CC.U.S. Supreme Court Gives Gag Order In Solicitor General's Gun Case toggle caption Spencer Platt/Getty Images This spring, the Supreme Court ruled that the attorney general could not say in public whether a law enforcement official believes the so-called "assault weapons" ban is constitutional. It's called the "Gag Order" and Justice Department lawyers were forced to keep that information from a defendant in a court case involving the ban's constitutionality. The court's opinion, released on Wednesday, is the first time the high court has ruled that the government must tell the public if it's thinking about taking a position on a controversial law. It's a development that's both welcome and alarming to opponents and supporters of the ban. The case the Supreme Court ruled on involves a woman from Michigan named Kimberley Rittiman. The Rittiman family used to own guns, but had not purchased a gun for several years. Because of the ban, Rittiman's husband said he could not purchase a gun for the family. He bought a shotgun for himself instead. He showed it to his wife when he got home. They decided that it was something his wife should try, and Rittiman pointed the shotgun at her belly to show her husband how to use it. The trigger was accidentally pulled and she was hit with the blast of the shotgun. The woman sued the gun makers and the state. As part of that suit, she asked the government to declare the ban unconstitutional. But her request was denied. A federal judge said she had no standing to challenge the constitutionality of the law. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit agreed, saying that because Rittiman had not been harmed by the ban, she couldn't prove that her rights were being violated. Rittiman appealed to the Supreme Court. The case has a complicated history. The Sixth Circuit
