Updated 12:48 p.m. Tuesday A decision by the University of Kansas to leave the Big 12 as the flagship school of the league took several weeks of negotiations, three people close to the discussions said. The process was complicated by the teams to leave the Big 12: the University of Nebraska and the University of Colorado. The schools wanted the Big 12 to pay them for leaving, while the commissioner of the Big 12, Bob Bowlsby, had concerns about the cost of the exit fee. The talks led to a decision to find an affiliation that would keep the University of Kansas in the conference. The original plan for Kansas to join the Big 12 was to have all the schools be in the same division. The Big 12's Board of Governors is expected to approve a plan for the schools to split into divisions. That means the University of Kansas will be in the Big 12 North, while the University of Missouri will be in the Big 12 South. The division-based format was used in 2011 and 2012, when all eight schools were in the same division. That format changed after the Big 12 added the University of Houston in 2012. Kansas chancellor Bernadette Gray-Little, who also is chancellor of the University of Kansas Health System, was not available for comment. Bowlsby said last week that he expected a decision on whether to keep Kansas in the Big 12 to be made by the end of
