To automatically update a viewer's images with the latest Photoshop updates, you can add Photoshop releases one at a time to a list. This will automatically update each viewer with the release's first observation, then after the release, all subsequent observations. In this way, you only need to write one release and have it set to update observers. Yet this technique doesn't work well if a majority of your assets are the same as those in the initial release. To get to the second release, users would have to go back to the first release and manually update all of their assets with the latest version. This is a big problem for organizations that have many different assets, as you could have weeks or months between releases. To solve this, we introduced the Photoshop Creative Cloud Architect (beta), which allows you to assemble a series of asset lists. The most critical asset list, for informed design review, is often the "master" assets -- the editorial, branding and UI assets that are created by the design team. These assets are usually uploaded to a repository to make them available and accessible for review. You can create more than one asset list, and apply changes to one list, while submitting changes to another list. This lets you create an archive of assets for review even if you don't have access to the assets themselves and/or don't care if they are updated. Finally, when an asset list is updated with a new Photoshop release, the list will be saved in the Creative Cloud. You can access the list from anywhere, without having to re-download the assets.
