It looks like Adobe has finally upgraded Photoshop to 64 bit. I'm sorry, but this is the worst iteration of the program in the last 20 years and not looking forward to spending time and money to get used to it. Hi all,
As my first Lightroom post, here's my take. There are many updates and new features in Lightroom 5 that are good and make it more attractive. However, the decisions taken by Adobe in the past few months have hopefully brought the free Lightroom to the next level. To use it is to love it; yes, its like falling in love. I'm impressed. I'm always intrigued by the latest release of Lightroom because I love the way I can use it. I may get used to some of the nuble updates, but I'm impressed that Adobe updated the Bridge. I'm VERY impressed with the Lens Correction feature. It works great. I tried including the Lens Correction correction in Lightroom, but couldn't get the results I wanted. Obviously, there's a "Learning Curve", but I think Adobe did a great job in this version of the program with regards to Lens Correction. After reading and reviewing some the notes, and the overall instructions for Lightroom, it looks like they are focusing on the new ease of use feature, which is most users. They never do what Photoshop does in the same way. When I look at the new raw editor, especially the new scroll bar, the layers panel, it almost looks like a Photoshop camera RAW file. That's what it should be like … the new features feel great, and look … very similar … to the in-camera file. It's like they stripped out what most users didn't ever use. It takes a bit to learn how to adjust the new features, and fine tune it too. The one thing I don't like about editing RAW files in LR5 is the super sized files it makes sometimes.
